ENTRANCE TO FORT ORD

SEVENTH DIVISION
UNITED STATES ARMY
FORT ORD, CALIFORNIA
1941
JOSEPH W. STILWELL
MAJOR GENERAL U. S. ARMY
Commanding Seventh Division, Fort Ord, Calif.

Born in Florida. Admitted to The United States Military Academy (at large) from State of New York, August 1, 1908. Commissioned Second Lieutenant, Infantry, June 15, 1910; First Lieutenant, March 2, 1911; Captain, July 1, 1914; Major, July 1, 1920; Lieutenant Colonel, May 4, 1928; Colonel, August 1, 1930; Brigadier General, July 1, 1939; Major General, October 1, 1940. Served in General Staff Corps, August 26, 1928, to April 27, 1929, and July 1, 1929, to March 17, 1929. Awarded Distinguished Service Medal for "Exceptionally meritorious and distinguished services, in a position of great responsibility," in 1919. "As a Lieutenant Colonel (Infantry), General Staff Corps, U. S. Army, in the capacity of Assistant Chief of Staff, G-2, Fourth Army Corps, during the St. Mihiel Offensive, and later during the operations in the Meuse, he displayed military attainment of a high order. With great energy and zeal he pursued the developments of the enemy activities on the Corps front, securing invaluable information which assisted in a marked degree in the planning of the operations. He contributed by the excellent performance of his task to the success of these operations."

Bachelor of Science, U. S. Military Academy, 1904; graduate of Command and General Staff School, 1926; graduate of Infantry School, Advanced Course, 1924.

FORT ORD VIEWS

A familiar sight to Division men is the military vehicle entrance to Fort Ord.

The Army makes it easy for soldiers to save their money—witness the branch bank which is allowed to locate in the Division Area.

Trucks and heavy machinery are constantly at work in the area, maintaining and improving it.
Fort Ord, along with every other Army Post in the United States, puts on a display of men and equipment for Army Day. Purpose of this event, held yearly, is to better acquaint U.S. citizens with their Army. The Army wants and invites every American to be well acquainted with the fighting forces.

Extremely powerful coast artillery searchlights seek out attacking planes at night, directing the anti-aircraft fire. The mechanism causes the searchlight beam to follow the direction of the operator's vision.
The insignia of the Seventh Division consists of two black, equilateral triangles placed vertically on a red circular disc, with their apices in juxtaposition at the center of the disc. The double triangle was designed by Colonel W. W. Taylor, Jr., Division Chief of Staff, while the Division was at Waco, Texas. It is a happy coincidence that the outline of the design is a numeral 7 crossed by another 7 inverted, thus forming two triangles. The similarity of the double triangle to an hour-glass was responsible for the nickname, "Hour-Glass Division."
A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE SEVENTH DIVISION

UNITED STATES ARMY

The early days of the Seventh Division, one of the outstanding units formed when the United States entered World War I, were exciting to the new soldiers just starting their experiences in the United States Army. The men were tense with anticipation of their service overseas and carried out their duties with an eye to being preserved when they joined the forces in France.

Various organizations of the "Hour-Glass Division," known so by their colorful insignia, were first located at Camp Wheeler in Georgia; Fort Sill, Oklahoma; Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia; Corpus Christi, Texas; Little Silver, New Jersey; Chickamauga Park, Georgia; and Camp Logan, Texas, where officers and men concentrated for weeks upon the fundamentals of military service.

Moving from camp to camp gave the men opportunities to study every type of warfare under varying conditions. On January 28, 1918, the 13th Brigade and 80th Field Artillery were ordered to Camp MacArthur at Waco, Texas. Other units followed until from June 15-17, the greatest number of the Seventh Division men were together before leaving for France.

Three days later, the 89th Field Artillery left to join the rest of the Seventh Field Artillery Brigade at Anniston, Alabama, and the Division did not see its field artillery again until after the Armistice.

On May 5, 1918, Headquarters of the Seventh Division were moved to Camp MacArthur with Brigadier General Charles H. Barth in command. Increasing to war strength, the 13th and 14th Infantry Brigades moved to Camp MacArthur to continue extensive training in offensive tactics using Springfield Rifles instead of Enfields.

Finally orders came. The advance party of the Seventh Division sailed for France on board the S. S. Finland, July 26, 1918, and landed at Brest on August 6. Soon after, the remaining outfits shipped over at intervals from July 31-September 15.

The Seventh Division was now a combat Division of the American Expeditionary Forces in France.

A record was established for the number of men carried destined for the A. E. F. when the S. S. Leviathan left New York on August 3 with 13,558 men on board.

After all units had debarked at Brest, a period of four to ten days was spent in the famous Rest Camp at Pontanezon Barracks before the troops experienced any actual war scene training at the 15th Training Area, near Ancy-le-France, Yonne, designated as the headquarters for the Seventh Division in France.

One unit, the 21st Machine Gun Battalion, debarked at Liverpool, England, on August 20, and marched to Knotty Ash Rest Camp, stayed one night then left for Southampton and Havre the next day. The first Field Order, dated September 25, 1918, prescribed the movement of the Seventh Division to the "Front."

On October 8-9, the Fourth Army Corps of the Seventh Division took over the territory known as the Puvnelle Sector, relieving the 90th Division. The St. Mihiel Sector, including the towns of Metz, Commercy, Chambly and Montmartre, was occupied by the Seventh Division.

The initial shellfire of the enemy fell by the Seventh came on October 11, and the next day, enemy airplanes kept up constant aerial observation over the entire Seventh Division Area. Units of the 55th Infantry were gassed by the Germans in the St. Mihiel woods directly behind the front lines.

During the period of "holding" the front lines in the Rembercourt-sur-Mad Sector, the Division served as a part of the Fourth Corps. On October 24, Brigadier General Lutz Wahl was made commanding officer, only to be succeeded four days later by Major General Edmund Wittenmyer.

The Division was constantly in advance, and overcame German resistance at Hills 323 and 310; took the Bois-du-Trou-de-Haie Salient; conducted a raid on Preny; and continued to advance on the morning of the Armistice by attacking La Chaussee, Charey, Rembrecourt and Prey. Strong artillery preparations had been made for the advance which was to start at 8 a.m. However, at 7:40 a.m. a message was received from the Fourth Corps headquarters that the Armistice would go into effect at 11 a.m., and that all hostilities would cease before or on that hour.

The telegram to the Seventh Division announcing the cessation of war read:

"2 MN NS 61 OB RUSH . . . WABASH, November 11, 1918.

Commanding General Seventh Division

7:15 hours period November ONE FOUR FOUR G three period Armistice signed period effective eleven hours eleventh November at or before which time all hostilities and advance must cease period Hold and accurately report line reached at that hour period No communication will be had with enemy period Acknowledge period by Command General Bullard—Signed HEINTZELMAN 842A."

Before the Armistice, the Seventh Division had participated for 33 days in the line and suffered a total of 1,988 casualties. During the brief advance into the enemy lines, one officer and 68 men of the enemy were captured.

After a final concentration at the LeMans area with Division headquarters at Conlei, units of the Seventh Division began the "Homeward Bound" trip, making the final crossing on June 30.

The Division disembarked at Hoboken, New Jersey; Bush Terminal, Brooklyn, New York; and Newport News, Virginia, proceeding to demobilization camps at Camp Mills, Long Island; Camp Merritt, New Jersey; and Camp Steward, Virginia. At Camp Funston, all emergency officers and enlisted men were discharged before October 31, 1919. At that time the strength of the Division was 258 officers and 1,379 enlisted men.

On March 24, 1923, the General Order No. 10 of the War Department ordered the Seventh Division units transferred to various organizations. The date marks the last recorded date of the existence of the Seventh Division, A. E. F.

June, 1940, brought the activation of numerous divisions after twenty years of peacetime demobilization, and the Seventh Division is today hard at work training at Fort Ord in the Monterey country of California.

The site, located about 14 miles from Salinas and seven miles from the bay city of Monterey, was purchased by the government on August 4, 1917. It has over 15,000 acres of suitable terrain for maneuvers and training grounds which provide excellent problems in practical warfare to every branch of the service.

An integral force of the United States Army, the Seventh Division was activated with permanent station at Fort Ord, California with the following units:

Seventh Division Headquarters; Headquarters and Military Police Company (less Band); Seventh Signal Company; Second Battalion, 17th Infantry; 32nd Infantry (less Headquarters and Headquarters Detachment and Companies E and F, Second Battalion); Battery F, 76th Field Artillery (75-mm. Gun Horse-Drawn); 31st Field Artillery (155-mm. Howitzer Truck-Drawn) less Band; 13th Engineer Battalion (Combat); Fourth Ordnance Company (M. Maintenance); Third Battalion, 76th Field Artillery (75-mm. Gun Horse-Drawn); Seventh Q. M. Battalion; Seventh Medical Battalion.

Effective August 1, 1940, the Seventh Division, United States Army, Fort Ord, California, began to function with the following organizations attached:

Seventh Division Headquarters; Headquarters and Military Police Company, Seventh Division; 17th Infantry; 32nd Infantry; 33rd Infantry; 76th Field Artillery (75-mm. Horse-Drawn); 31st Field Artillery (155-mm. Howitzer, Truck-Drawn); 13th Engineer Battalion; Seventh Quartermaster Battalion; Seventh Medical Battalion; Seventh Medical Regiment; Attached Medical Organizations, Seventh Division.

The 76th Field Artillery transferred cadres to other Artillery units, and these units became:

Seventh Division Artillery; 31st Field Artillery; 74th Field Artillery; 75th Field Artillery; 76th Field Artillery.

FOREWORD

National Mobilization is an event of the deepest significance to all: when the nation is confronted by dangers which are so great as to compel the citizen to make a temporary sacrifice of part of his individual rights and interests in order to lend increased strength to the national unity which is our only real defense. Though all must participate in defense, the sacrifice of the soldier is the most urgent. This is a universal offering, whether the soldier be volunteer or selectee. The very nature of our service is a bond which should draw us together in a communion closer than any other on earth. At no time in life will your comrades be closer to you than they must be in a good army. Since it is our desire to make ours the best Army on earth, so must you cherish your comrades as the best of all. This little book provides an opportunity to preserve the memory of the associations which all of us are making in this critical period. I feel it an honor, as Regimental Commander, to dedicate it to "The Men of The Fifty-Third Infantry."

A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE 53RD INFANTRY

Created for service with the Sixth Division in the World War, the 53rd Infantry was organized June 16, 1917, at Chickamauga Park, Georgia, by transfer of personnel from the Sixth Infantry and by subsequent addition of officers and enlisted men.

The regiment remained at Chickamauga Park until May 3, 1918, when it moved to Camp Wadsworth, South Carolina, where it stayed until June 26. On the latter date, it entrained for port of embarkation and arrived at Camp Mills, New York, two days later.

The 53rd Infantry sailed toward battle and honor on July 6, and arrived in Glasgow, Scotland, on July 18 and entrained immediately for England. The First and Second Battalions arrived in France July 23, and were followed two days later by the Third Battalion. The entire regiment took station in the Ninth Training Area where it continued training until August 27, when it was ordered to the Gerardmer Sector (Alsace) for front-line training with the French.

Entering the front lines on September 2 to relieve elements of the 35th American Division, the regiment remained there until October 12, when the Sixth Division was relieved in the Gerardmer Sector by the French First and 162nd Divisions. The 53rd Infantry then moved to the rear of that sector for rest and training, and remained there until October 26.

The regiment, with other units of the division, was then ordered to the American First Army Corps, and on November 1 was designated as corps reserve. On November 8 it was designated as army reserve. While serving overseas during the World War the regiment earned the following named battle participation credits:

Gerardmer Sector (Alsace)—September 2-October 12, 1918.

Meuse-Argonne Operation—November 1-8, 1918.

The 53rd Infantry returned to the United
The U. S. S. Leviathan, famous for its record crossings, brought the 33rd Infantry back home after victorious service in France.

States June 12, 1919, and four days later entrained for Camp Grant, Illinois, where it remained until October 23, 1921, and then moved to Fort Francis E. Warren (then Fort D. A. Russell). The regiment was made inactive at that post September 23, 1922.

The 33rd Infantry, Regular Army, is entitled to a streamer in the colors of the Victory Ribbon, embroidered: Alsace, Meuse-Argonne.

The 33rd Infantry Band, who played their way to victory and into the hearts of the French people.
The 53rd Infantry learns, in addition to such things as manual of arms and marksmanship, another phase of offensive warfare . . . landings. The transportation of troops across water involves many hazards which become minor problems when the men are trained efficiently. Initial practice is done on land with a large wooden frame, draped with rope ladders simulating the wharf of an important objective. Once completely familiar with landing tactics, studied on the land wharf, the troops go down to Monterey Bay to perform landings with skill and ease under actual conditions. On these pages the 53rd shows how landings are perfected: from ground practice to a quick and quiet wharf invasion.
LANDING OPERATIONS

A 53RD INFANTRY MACHINE GUN PLATOON LANDS ON THE BEACH OF THE SALINAS RIVER
Recruits and selectees of the 53rd Infantry spend many morning hours practicing manual of arms. Executed in detail, manual of arms drill permits each soldier to become accustomed to handling his rifle. After several weeks of hard work, the new infantrymen pass retreat inspection with poise and assurance.
MARKSMANSHIP
53RD INFANTRYMEN MUST LEARN TO FIRE ACCURATELY AND RAPIDLY

The ability to fire each weapon with speed and accuracy is important in the training of the 53rd Infantry. Expert firing of such weapons as the 60-mm. mortar, shown at left, or the rifle, as in picture above, have ranked the American soldier at the top in marksmanship.

THE FIRST PRESIDIO

Along the shore of a gray and storm-tossed bay a pitiful little party of men was traveling wearily northward. A wintry wind tore at their garments and tugged at the tails of their horses. Ahead were four who might have been leaders, men, indeed who by their bearing might be leaders in any company.

One was a priest, another a grizzled dragoon, the third, a bearded army officer and the fourth a mere youngster.
Except the priest, all were armed with swords. Behind them came a group of foot soldiers and behind these again a packtrain. The packsaddles were all but empty and all too many of the mules were employed as carriers for litters, whereon men reclined painfully, groaning or cursing as inequalities in the ground caused the mules to jolt their swollen limbs. Other men and other mules and horses, a goodly company in all, followed, while far ahead of the leaders a group of six or eight horsemen was disappearing in the distance.

On these men, though they did not know it, fate was playing as grim and cruel a jest as history discloses. They were Don Gaspar de Portola and his party of explorers, come from Lower California to found a presidio and mission on the shore of the "Port of Monterey," and they were marching along the very bay they had sought for months, yet did not recognize it.

Instead, they were bound away on many a weary day's march to find it elsewhere. It was the eighth of October, 1769. They had been beside the bay, seeking vainly for some sign to identify it as the object of their search, since the night of September 30. Already they had marched one full day along its shore in their effort to find it elsewhere. Many of them were suffering from scurvy; 16, a quarter of their number, had lost the use of their limbs; their provisions had dwindled almost to exhaustion, yet they kept on, and they left behind them, as monuments of their journey, names which endure to the present.

RIO PAJARO

That day they found a great bird, measuring seven feet four inches between wingtips, which the Indians had killed and stuffed with straw. They thought it a royal eagle and assumed the natives had been preparing it for some ceremony. Later, when they crossed the stream that empties into the center of the bay of Monterey, close to where Watsonville since has arisen, the soldiers called it the Rio Pajaro. Struggling northward for two more days along the shore, they reached the Rio San Lorenzo, which name likewise persists to the present time. Their route probably paralleled the present road from Aptos through Soquel to Santa Cruz and certainly could not have been far from it. They crossed the river where Santa Cruz now stands and camped a league from Point Ano Nuevo, on what is now Waddell Creek about where it is crossed by the coast road north from Santa Cruz.

There they rested two days. Portola and Rivera were

On this spot Captain Visasino landed in 1602, and named his discovery Monterey. His records launched a long quest for the Port of Monterey, and Spanish explorers suffered many hardships in the search. It was not until 1770 that the site was definitely established.
This modest house, built in the late 1830's, was occupied by Lieutenant William Tecumseh Sherman, destined to great fame in the future, in 1847.

CELEBRATED FORMER RESIDENTS

Monterey has been honored by the presence, at one time or another, from 1846 to 1856, of many officers who have since distinguished themselves. Halleck served a term of duty at the old California capital; so also did William T. Sherman, and Phillip Kearney, who was killed at Chantilly, and General Riley. Colonel Burton, who married a senorita of San Diego, died since the war; his widow is still living at Jamul, in San Diego County, and her pretty daughter, Nellie, is the wife of Miguel Pedroreno, who has cattle on a thousand hills. Sully, who married the prettiest girl at Monterey in those days, Senorita Manuela Jimeno, rose to the rank of Major General in the Union Army, and died a few years ago in Oregon. Among others were General Reynolds, a Captain at Monterey, who died at Antietam; General Lyon, then a Captain, who was killed in Missouri; General Magruder, then brevet Colonel; General Andrews, then a Lieutenant, who was on Canby's staff at the taking of Mobile; General Stoneman, then Lieutenant, one of the most gallant of the Federal officers, now one of the Railroad Commissioners of California; General Slemmer, then a Lieutenant, badly wounded at Stone river; General Mason, then a Lieutenant, now retired; General Heintzelman, then brevet Major, who commanded in Washington most of the time during the war; General Frank Patterson, then Lieutenant, who raised one of the first regiments in Philadelphia; General Armistead, then brevet Major, who left Los Angeles with Albert Sydney Johnson, and was killed at the Battle of Gettysburg; General E. O. C. Ord, then Captain; Lieutenant Murray; Major Ringgold, who died at San Francisco some years ago.
ill. Meat and vegetables had given out. Five tortillas, made partly of bran and partly of flour, were the daily ration of each man.

Still they pushed on, and in one day’s march reached a camp site near what is known now as Pigeon Point. The following day’s journey was a long one, all the way past what is now Pescadero to San Gregorio Creek. It began to rain heavily and everyone in camp was stricken with an intestinal complaint. Doubtless having the ravages of cholera in mind, they despaired of recovery or escape but soon found that the new ailment was operating to relieve them of the scurvy which had proved such a scourge. The swelling of their limbs began to reduce itself and in two days they were able to proceed. Crespi called the camp Santo Domingo but the soldiers termed it “Valle de los Soldados Curtos,” which seemed a sufficient index of their state of mind.

However, nobody faltered and they made two leagues over rough going to Purisima Creek in one day. The slopes and ravines that hampered them so had been graded away or filled up now for a motor highway to pass.

On October 28, the explorers camped on Pilarcitos Creek, probably not far from where it empties into Half Moon Bay near the present town of Miramar. Every man in the party was ill. The supply of medicines was almost gone and food was very scarce. It rained that night and they kept to their camp next day, which was Sunday.

Moving on again on Monday they made note of Pillar Point but gave it no name. They had a hard day, the pioneers having to build bridges to get the animals across several deep arroyos, and at the end of it they found bitter disappointment. A ridge of rock jutting out across the beach barred their way along the ocean shore and a new route had to be sought. In a sheltered nook in the mountains they camped while the scouts explored a passage through the sierra.

“GREATEST DISCOVERY”

By ten o’clock the next morning the pioneers had cut and dug a way over the bold promontory of Point San Pedro and the party started a climb through the hills. From the crest of the highest one they beheld a vast bay, ending to the north in what unmistakably was Point Reyes. Before them lay what then and for some time afterward was called the Bay of San Francisco. Now they knew they were far to the north of Monterey but they were elated by sight of the “bay”—they were to see the real one later—and made camp with good cheer in the San Pedro valley at the foot of the Montara Mountains.

Portola sent Ortega and his men out to explore the country as far as Point Reyes. While these were away some of the other soldiers asked permission to hunt for deer, which the commander granted. They went east and did not return until after nightfall, but brought report of the greatest discovery yet made in California.
They had seen, they said, a great arm of the sea running into the land as far as the eye could reach. It was the southern section of the bay of San Francisco. The day was November 2, 1769. They rested another day, while awaiting the return of Ortega, and on the fourth had a feast of mussels gathered from the rocks roundabout. That afternoon they started on, to have a look at this new find.

They went north up the beach a little and then turned into the mountains to their right. From a summit they beheld the vast estero or gulf reported by the deer hunters and, after feasting their eyes upon so remarkable a sight, clambered down into the Canada de San Andres, now largely occupied by the reservoirs which supply the city of San Francisco with water. They turned down this canyon south and southeast camping beside a low hill covered with brush and having a cluster of oak trees at its base.

For two days more they marched down a great ravine, parallel with but far below the route of the Sky Line Boulevard of today. They took much pleasure in noting the beauties of the country, with its groves of oak, madrone and redwood. This last, indeed, took its name at the hands of this party which had first seen the specie on October 10, while struggling to cover the distance from the Pajaro River around the shore of Monterey Bay to Santa Cruz. Crespi wrote that they had come upon "some tall trees of reddish colored wood of a species unknown to us, having leaves very unlike those of the cedar and without a cedar odor; and as we knew not the name of the trees, we gave them that of the color of the wood."

In their march down the San Andres canyon the explorers saw the tracks of many deer and some bear and were met by many Indians. These were most friendly, offering the half-starved Spaniards food which was accepted with gratitude. Following the canyon in a sharp turn to the east, they came suddenly to its end on November 6 and saw before them a broad valley and the end of the bay which they had been coasting, though out of sight of it because they had followed the canyon.

DISCOVERY OF CARQUINEZ STRAIT

They named the canyon San Francisco and the stream which flowed from it is known today as San Francisco Creek. They followed this stream a short distance and camped that night at its edge, about 100 paces above the great redwood tree around which the city of Palo Alto has grown up and which continues today as it was then, a landmark for miles around.

From the signs made by some Indians the explorers thought it possible that a vessel, either the relief ship San Jose or the San Carlos, was anchored somewhere nearby, awaiting them. They accordingly rested in camp while Ortega and his men set search for the ship.
The scouting party was away four days, during which, for lack of meat, the main body of the expedition subsisted largely on acorns and developed indigestion. Ortega's report was negative as far as finding a ship was concerned but he did tell of a second great arm of the sea extending to the northeast and joining the one they had seen. Because of this a certain group of historians, led by Eldredge, credit him with the discovery of Carquinez Strait, though others accord that honor elsewhere.

Once more Portola called his officers together to discuss the situation. They agreed the best course was to return to the Punta des Pinos and make a new search for the port of Monterey, which they now were convinced they had passed. This decision was acted upon immediately. The party started back that same afternoon, retracing the route already covered, and arrived at a little lake, in sight of the point, on November 27.

Thus they had been but 16 days in returning over a journey which had occupied them originally from October 4 to November 6, and this, too, in spite of the fact that they had to shoot wild geese and gather mussels for their food on the way back. Next day they moved over the ridge to the Rio Carmelo, where there was a good water supply, and rested.

Rivera, with ten soldiers and six Indians, was sent south to make a thorough exploration of the coast and see whether the port of Monterey was concealed in some hidden pocket of the mountains. He returned late on December 4, all his men wearied from long climbs through the mountains, and with no word of a port. In camp the food was about gone. A mule had been butchered but only the Indians and a few Catalan volunteers would eat the meat. The situation was grave and Portola called another council to consider it.

The commander was in a sad state of perplexity. Where Vizcaino had reported a splendid port was but an open roadstead; where the discoverer had told in glowing terms of finding numbers of peaceful inhabitants, skilled in the growing of flax and hemp, the explorer could find only a scanty population of wild and savage natives. These facts, and the announcement that there were but seven sacks of flour left, Portola laid before them, asked their consideration, and postponed until the following day whatever decision was to be taken, so that all might have time for mature deliberation.

The result of the discussions was a conclusion to return to San Diego. But before they left they erected crosses on the shore of Carmel Bay and Monterey Bay and inscribed them to call attention to records left buried at their feet, so that if the San Jose or any other party should come there a record of what Portola's people had done would be available.

A SECOND EXPEDITION

December 11 they started back up the Salinas River and 10 days later had got through the dread passage of the Santa Lucia range. They were fortunate in killing many geese, but even so the trip had severe difficulties. On January 3 they reached the northern-most settlements of the Channel Indians, who fed them well, so that they were soon restored to health, and on January 24, 1770, they marched into San Diego once more.

Portola at once prepared for a second expedition to seek the port of Monterey. Setting out on April 17 with Fages, 12 of the Catalan volunteers, seven presidial cavalrmen, Father Crespi, two muleteers and five natives, Portola again arrived on the shore of Monterey Bay on May 24. This trip north took 38 days, as compared with the 79 the original march from San Diego to Monterey had required. The commander chose a place for the camp and then, with Fages, Crespi and one soldier for a guard, went to the place where the cross had been set up.

They found around it a ring of arrows, thrust point downward into the ground, and at its foot a small pile of shellfish. Some of the arrows were decorated with feathers; others had fish or meat attached to them. All, it developed, had been placed by the Indians because they wished to be on friendly terms with the white men and the strange God they worshipped, for they had observed the reverence in which the Spaniards held the cross. On their return from this excursion there occurred one of the most dramatic events of the entire expedition.

They were strolling along the beach, admiring the bay's blue and placid expanse, broken only by the play of seals and the spouting of whales, when suddenly they recognized it as the long-sought port of Monterey. All, says Father Palou in his book, broke forth with one voice: "This is the port of Monterey which we seek, in form exactly as described by Sebastian Vizcaino and Cabrera Bueno!"

Casa De Oro (House of Gold) once served as a gold depository and later as a residence. It then fell to the low estate of a saloon and warehouse. It has since been restored as a State Historic Monument.
At almost the same time the reason why they had not recognized it before became apparent to them. On their previous trips, the winds had come from the southwest, from which direction the bay was exposed. Now, in summer, the winds took another direction and the bay was sheltered by the land. From Punta Ano Nuevo on the north around to the Punta de los Pinos on the south it assumed the form of a vast "O" of calm water. It fitted the descriptions over which they had pored so often.

THE PRESIDIO IS FOUNDED

Thus, in 1770 the Presidio of Monterey proper was founded by Portola, at the same time as the Mission, or Royal Chapel, of Monterey (now known as San Carlos Church) was built. In 1771, Father Serra removed the mission to Carmelo, in order to have it in close proximity to an abundance of arable land and a convenient and sufficient supply of fresh water for all purposes; but the Presidio remained in Monterey.

The original Presidio was located along the north side of what is now Fremont Street, between Abrego Street and El Estero, and extending northward toward the Bay. It seems to have been a simple enclosure formed by the temporary buildings for the housing of the different units of the expedition. It was not built for the exclusive use of soldiers, but as a protection against any attack from supposedly hostile natives. The presence of soldiers in California was deemed essential, but the great civilizing influence exerted by Spain over the native population was through her missionaries. The Presidio stood guard, but its active aid was seldom invoked. Thus the Presidio became second in importance to the missions.

Just when the Presidio was removed to its present site on the hill is not known; but it was some time before August 30, 1818. The present Presidio of Monterey was re-established in 1900, after the Spanish-American War, the 15th Infantry being the first to occupy it. Prior to that time it had lain wasted for nearly 60 years. It is now considered one of the best military posts in the United States and is a favorite among the rank and file of the entire Army. Owing to its beautiful and commanding situation, one of the most wonderful and awe-inspiring views in the world can be obtained from its parade ground on a clear day.
